

What? No Website?

A website is an essential element in your marketing strategy.

The latest ABS statistics suggest 81.3 per cent of businesses in Australia have internet access, yet less than 30 per cent of accounting firms in Australia have a website. In the words of the late Professor Julius Sumner Miller, “Why is it so?”

Clearly many accountants don’t recognise the purpose, value or potential of a website. The fact is, most accountant’s websites in this country are best described as electronic billboards that simply provide the who, what and where. In my opinion, the primary purpose of an accountant’s website is to generate new business leads.

First impressions

You can make a first impression only once with a prospective new client and, increasingly, your website will be the first thing people ‘meet’. An amateurish website or no website at all is not the type of impression you want to make with a potential new business client or prospective employee.

What do the 70% of firms without a website say when clients ask, “Do you have a website?” or “Can I check you out on the net?” You can tell them, “It’s under construction” only for so long.

If you have an ageing client base that needs an injection of fresh blood, you can’t afford to be without a website. It should sell your services to potential clients and also offer benefits to existing clients. It should tell people who you are, what you offer and most importantly, why you should be their accountant.

Readily accessible, available 24/7 and highly visible your website gives you the opportunity to present your firm and the services you offer in the most positive light. It needs to be more than just a billboard and should ‘talk’ to your niche markets with relevant content.

Stand out from the crowd

In addition, given the shortage of quality staff in the accounting talent pool, your website should also double as a recruitment tool. The traditional employment ad is of limited benefit in today’s competitive environment and without a website you have virtually no chance of attracting the best Generation X and Y candidates. They will thoroughly review your website, including the staff and partner profiles, before applying for a position. They will check the careers section to see if you offer ongoing training and staff incentives. As such, your website must appeal to this demographic, send the right message, sell the career benefits you offer and be up to date.

So many firms look for a quick fix and buy an ‘off the shelf’ website that contains nothing but a series of outbound links to the ATO website. I can tell you, your clients don’t want to read content from the Tax Office website and being ‘outbound links’ they generally don’t help your search engine ranking.

These websites don’t attract prospects and, because they all look the same, it defeats the purpose of differentiating your firm in a crowded market.

Time for an upgrade?

If your current website isn't driving new business, it's time for a new website. Creating quality content that targets your niche markets takes time and the truth is, your website will always be a work in progress. As your website generates more new business you can invest in some additional features.

Without doubt, content is king when creating your website but building a great website is obviously pointless if no one finds you on the internet. Search engine optimisation (SEO) is a very important part of the website development process but that's a topic for another day.

Start by identifying your niche areas (both industries and services) and create some quality content that resonates with the target market by including keywords and phrases they are likely to type into the various search engines. From there you can start building inbound links from dozens of other websites (hotfrog, true local etc.) that will lift your search engine rankings.

There are lots of marketing groups that want to work with you to grow your accounting firm. Some promise a quick fix, but in reality, there is no marketing 'silver bullet' for accountants.

You need to recognise that all your business resources play a role in marketing, including your staff right down to your logo, slogan, letterhead, business cards, signage and the reception area. For accountants, without a website you are simply not in the game.

Pat Camm is the Principal of P J Camm & Associates, a firm of practice management and marketing consultants to the profession. Visit www.pjcamm.com.au for more information

NATIONAL ACCOUNTANT JOURNAL
APRIL/MAY 2011 ARTICLE

What? No website?

A website is an essential element of your marketing strategy.

The latest ABS figures suggest 81.3 per cent of businesses in Australia have internet access, yet less than 30 per cent of accounting firms in Australia have a website. In the words of the late Professor Julius Sumner Miller, "Why is it so?"

Clearly many accountants don't recognise the purpose, value or potential of a website. The fact is, most accountants' websites in this country are best described as electronic billboards that simply provide the who, what and where. In my opinion, the primary purpose of an accountant's website is to generate new business leads.

First impressions

You can make a first impression only once with a prospective new client and, increasingly, your website will be the first thing people 'meet'. An amateurish website or no website at all is not the type of impression you want to make with a potential business client or prospective employee.

What do the 70 per cent of firms without a website say when clients ask, "Do you have a website?" or "Can I check you out on the net?" You can tell them "it's under construction" only for so long.

If you have an ageing client base that needs an injection of fresh blood, you can't afford to be without a website. It should sell your services to potential clients and also offer benefits to existing clients. It should tell people who you are, what you offer and, most importantly, why you should be their accountant.

Readily accessible, available 24/7 and highly visible, your website gives you the opportunity to present your firm and the services you offer in the most positive light. It needs to be more than just a billboard and should "talk" to your niche markets with relevant content.

Stand out from the crowd

In addition, given the shortage of quality staff in the accounting talent pool, your website should also double as a recruitment tool. The traditional employment ad is of limited benefit in today's competitive environment and without a website you have virtually no chance of attracting the best Generation X and Y candidates. They will thoroughly review your website, including the staff and partner profiles, before applying for a position. They will check the careers section to see if you offer ongoing training and staff incentives. As such, your website must appeal to this demographic, send the right message, sell the career benefits you offer and be up-to-date.

So many firms look for a quick fix and buy an 'off the shelf' website that contains nothing but a series of outbound links to the ATO website. I can tell you, your clients don't want to read content from the Tax Office website and, being 'outbound links', they generally don't help your search engine ranking.

These websites don't attract prospects and, because they all look the same, it defeats the purpose of differentiating your firm in a crowded market.

Time for an upgrade?

If your current website isn't driving new business, it's time for a new website. Creating quality content that targets your niche markets takes time and, the truth is, your website will always be a work in progress. As your website generates more new business, you can invest in some additional features.

Without doubt, content is king when creating your website but building a great website is obviously pointless if no one finds you on the internet. Search engine optimisation (SEO) is a very important part of the website development process – but that's a topic for another day.

Start by identifying your niche areas (both industries and services) and create some quality content that resonates with the target market by including keywords and phrases they are likely to type into the various search engines. From there you can start building inbound links from dozens of other websites (hotfrog, true local, etc.) that will lift your search engine rankings.

There are lots of marketing groups that want to work with you to grow your accounting firm. Some promise a quick fix, but in reality there is no marketing 'silver bullet' for accountants.

You need to recognise that all your business resources play a role in marketing, including your staff right down to your logo, slogan, letterhead, business cards, signage and the reception area. For accountants without a website, you are simply not in the game. ▀

Pat Camm is the principal of P J Camm & Associates, a firm of practice management and marketing consultants to the profession. Visit www.pjcamm.com.au for more information.